Antigonus I Monophthalmus, more commonly known as Antigonus the One-Eyed, was a Macedonian general who served under Alexander the Great. After Alexander's death in 323 BC, Antigonus became one of the most powerful generals in the ensuing Wars of the Diadochi, and eventually established himself as the ruler of a vast empire in Asia Minor.

Antigonus was born in 382 BC in the city of Tyrus, Phoenicia. His father, Philip, was a Macedonian nobleman, and his mother, Stratonice, was a Persian princess. Antigonus was a skilled general and a ruthless politician, and he quickly rose through the ranks of Alexander's army. He fought in many of Alexander's most famous battles, including the Battle of Granicus River, the Battle of Issus, and the Battle of Gaugamela.

After Alexander's death, Antigonus became one of the most powerful generals in the Wars of the Diadochi. He fought against other generals such as Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Lysimachus, and eventually established himself as the ruler of a vast empire in Asia Minor. Antigonus's empire included the regions of Phrygia, Lycia, Pamphylia, and Cappadocia. He also controlled the cities of Ephesus, Sardis, and Pergamum.

Antigonus was a skilled general and a ruthless politician. He was also a patron of the arts and sciences, and he founded the city of Antigonía in Phrygia. Antigonus was a powerful and influential figure in the Hellenistic period, and he is considered to be one of the greatest generals in history.
